Picture: Shutterstock The 1990s rock scene was known to bring us a steady diet of grunge and flannel, with Seattle serving as the home of the alternative scene. The bright, artificial, technicolor feel of the 1980s was replaced by a much more earthy and grounded energy. In addition to the alternative rock scene, British bands also made a splash, bringing a combination of punk, rock, electronics and even classical music influences to the table. Want to know what the 1990s rock anthem is? This quiz will help you find it! Maybe you have a pretty dark outlook on life and an extremely low opinion of humanity in general. If you really will welcome the news of the apocalypse, Black Hole Sun, from Soundgarden, seems like the perfect anthem for your pessimistic vibe. On the other hand, maybe you're a lot more optimistic. If you have your fingers crossed that your dream relationship is on the horizon, maybe this could be just the day you throw back at you. It also seems like Wonderwall, from Oasis, would be a fitting anthem. Maybe your vibe is somewhere between apocalyptic and sunny and lollipops. Don't be afraid! Well, there are so many methods such as there are writing groups, but it often comes down to sit and looking at what that particular moment requires in the show. A hundred years ago, when musical theatre was still finding its base, composers and songwriters began to discover certain forms of songs that proved useful for specific positions in the show and for special needs -- best practices, if you will. More recently, the writers of musical theatre have tried to go beyond standard tropes and explore other, more flexible forms of songs. However, some of these songs have consistently proved useful even for the most experimental writers, because they are so ingrained in the public consciousness that they can be used to convey some of the most important parts of a musical. Here are five types of songs that appear in everything from old-school musicals to contemporary scores. As the name suggests, a song I want expresses what a character is looking for and yearning for, usually within the first fifteen minutes or so of the show. This is the one type of song that still embraces the most experimental musicals, because the writers use it to connect the audience with the protagonist and make them root for the character's journey immediately. A good song I Want lays the foundation for the strong development of the character and sets the audience's expectations of where the show might be headed. Examples include: Something's Coming from the West Side StorySome People, from Gypsy Wouldn't Be Lovely, from My Fair Lady Corner of the Sky by Pippin Part of Your World by The Little Mermaid The Magician and I from My Wicked Shot by Hamilton How can you get your characters to sing to be in love at the beginning of the show? You do it conditionally, writing the love song with an if, a technique pioneered by the great Oscar Hammerstein II. Sure, there's such a thing as love at first sight, but it's much easier to buy with a little dramatic irony: the characters don't know they're in love, but we know what's going to happen. Modern musicals have explored different variations on this type of song, from making it more cynical (often to experimental or rock musicals) or shifting it to being a buddy duet instead of a romantic one. Examples include: Make Believe from Show Boat If I Loved You by Carousel People will say we're in love from Oklahoma! I'll Know from Guys and Dolls Falling Smoas slowly from Once Perfect For You from Next To Normal Before musicals become more complete and cohesive, it was common for songwriters to create songs that simply gave them the opportunity to show off their comic skills. These songs were often lists of one-liners and references, and therefore do not always age very well, although it is still fantastic fun just for wordplay. The undisputed king of the comic book song list was Cole Porter, although Lorenz Hart and Ira Gershwin certainly gave Porter a run for his money. Although the types of references have changed, contemporary composers and lyricists continue to always resist the temptation to write one of these songs. Examples include: You're the Pinnacle of Anything Going Friendship by DuBarry was a Lady To Keep My Love Alive by a Connecticut YankeeZip by Pal Joey La Vie Boheme from Rent A Musical from Something Rotten! A break in the theatre has always been a huge pain, and the chance of everyone getting back in their seats on time is quite small. What's a writer to do? In many cases, musicals will feature some kind of bonus number at the beginning of the second act. These songs usually have only a little to do with the plot, could include secondary characters, and are more likely to be entertaining, dance-heavy numbers to ease the audience back in. Examples include: Disguise from The Phantom of the Opera It's You from The Music Man Paris Holds The Key (To Your Heart) by Anastasia Try Me by She Loves MeFidey Feet by an American in Paris One By One from The Lion King Take Back Your Mink by Guys and Dolls It was that Broadway performances started at 8:45 p.m. (as seen in A Quarter to Nine , on 42nd Street). This meant that most shows would have to wrap things up around 11 p.m., and it became a common practice to build a penultimate number that would actually stop the show, often allowing the star the chance to shine, downtown onstage. In many cases, these are emotionally rich moments, often at the lowest or most deeply felt point of a character in their arc, and so this is a type of song that has endured in all seasons and underspeeds. Examples include: Sending in the Clown from a Little Night Wife Lot by Caroline, or Changing Being Alive by the Company Rose's Turn from Gypsy What You Have From Rent All Fades Away From the Bridges of Madison County Gimme Gimme by Well Modern Millie This Used to Be Mine by Waitress Picture: CMA Compilation Country Music Can Speak to the Soul.
